Having considered the findings of the developer's Archaeological Desk-Based Assessment, which has reviewed all the available evidence from previous work in this area, as well as historic mapping and Lidar data, this office agrees with its conclusions that the site has low archaeological potential.

It lies in an area which was unlikely to be favourable for human settlement or activity prior to the drainage of the fens in the post-medieval period. Previous evaluations on land directly adjacent to the north has confirmed this picture, with no signs of human activity, and revealing deposits associated with previous inundations.

Therefore in this instance we would recommend that no further archaeological input be required.
