The development site lies in an area of archaeological interest. Roman pottery has been recovered from both the north and east of the site, which may indicate settlement in this area during this period. Middle Saxon pottery has also been recovered from the adjacent field, which is rare in this area, and could also indicate the presence of settlement remains nearby.

However, given the small scale of the development, which includes areas previously disturbed by existing outbuildings, it is unlikely that any archaeology encountered would be well preserved.

For this reason I recommend that no archaeological input is required in this instance.
