Fulney Hall is located in an area of archaeological interest, with Saxon remains uncovered to the north and east during development at Springfields and evidence for the medieval hamlet of Fulney to the west.

Fulney Hall stands on the site of a large Tudor house built by Sir Matthew Gamlyn using materials from the dissolved Spalding Priory. This hall had been demolished by 1847 and the present hall constructed using salvaged stonework.

However, from the information provided it would appear that there would be limited groundworks required by the proposed development, with prefabricated buildings positioned to make use of existing hardstandings. Therefore it is unlikely that the proposed development would have a significant impact on any below ground archaeological remains.

On this basis we would therefore recommend that no archaeological input be required.
