These two types of information are not necessarily related. For example, a company may have a high level of transparency in its financial reporting, but not in its environmental reporting. The degree of transparency in a company's reporting is a function of the company's internal controls, the quality of its management, and the level of stakeholder pressure. The degree of transparency in a company's reporting is also a function of the company's size, its industry, and its geographical location. The degree of transparency in a company's reporting is also a function of the company's history of transparency and the level of stakeholder pressure.
